

SALES DEPARTMENT BRIEF

The Name Change: Hub to OS

Why the new name does the selling for you

Accelerated Experiences, LLC

Prepared for Barry Burris · Sales Director

July 23, 2026

We renamed the product line. Every “Hub” is now an “OS.” This isn’t cosmetic — it’s a positioning move that puts your best sales argument right in the name. Here’s the thinking, and how to run with it.

The problem with “Hub”

“Hub” sounds nice, but it doesn’t tell a prospect what they’re buying. Ask ten business owners what a “hub” is and you’ll get ten shrugs — a website? a dashboard? a Slack thing? The word is soft. It makes the buyer stop and ask “wait, what is it?” — and every second you spend answering that is a second you’re not selling value. Worse, “hub” reads like a nice-to-have: an add-on, a convenience, something to cut when budgets get tight.

Why “OS” wins

Everybody already knows what an operating system is. It’s the thing the whole machine runs on. Nobody asks “what’s an OS?” — they instantly picture the layer everything else depends on. Put that word on our product and the name does three things before you say a sentence:

- It explains the category. “Abode OS” = the operating system a real estate business runs on. The buyer gets it in two words.
- It reframes the value. An OS isn’t a nice-to-have you cut in lean times — it’s infrastructure you can’t run without. That’s a completely different budget line.
- It raises the ceiling. “The system your business runs on” carries a bigger, stickier price than “a hub for your business.” Same product, heavier word.

This is leverage — the name is a sales tool

Naming is positioning. We moved the strongest thing we say about the product — “this runs your whole business” — out of your pitch and into the title, where the prospect reads it before you open your mouth. You’re no longer talking someone up from “convenience tool” to “core system.” The name starts them there. That shortens the call, lifts perceived value, and turns a cut-it-first line item into a keep-it-first one.

“Hub” asks the buyer a question. “OS” gives them the answer.

How the full name reads when you sell it

Product name, version, and tier stack into one clean line. Here’s a real one, at the size a prospect sees it on a proposal:

HOW THE FULL NAME READS WHEN YOU SELL IT

Abode OS

Version 6.1 · Grandsuite

The operating system your real estate business runs on.

Format: “[Name] OS · Version 6.1 · [Tier]” — tiers are Lite · Standard · Grandsuite. The mother platform is AE OS (aexperiences.studio). Prices did not change — only the names.

The renamed line

OS name	Old name	Who it's for
Abode OS	Homestead	Real estate brokerages & teams
Buttress OS	Draftline	Architecture studios & firms
Truss OS	Datum	Engineering practices
Musical OS	Marquee	Live theater
8mm OS	Reel	Film & production
Amphitheater OS	Encore	Concerts & venues
LilNinja OS	Cartwheel	Kids gyms
4barrel OS	Showroom	Independent & used-car dealers
Targeted OS	(marketing)	Marketing — your flagship lead

In motion right now (from Anthony)

Two things are being built as we speak, so you know what's coming:

- New icons for every OS. Anthony is designing all the OS system icons himself — each vertical gets its own custom mark. Decks and showroom art will refresh as those land.
- Showroom demos → live Grandsuite. The showroom versions you demo are being switched over to the live, fully-working, automated Grandsuite builds — so when you show a prospect “the top tier,” they’re seeing the real automated system running, not a mockup.

How to talk about it

Your one-liner:

“It’s the operating system your [practice / brokerage / theater] runs on — leads, scheduling, billing, clients, and an AI team, in one place.”

Lead with Targeted OS. It’s your flagship, and your own hub is the live proof — you can show it working, not describe it. Wow them with the top tier, then trim to budget with Standard or Lite.

If a prospect saw “Hub” somewhere and asks:

“Same product — we renamed it so the name says what it does. It’s the operating system for your business.”

Why this helps you close

- Less explaining, more selling. The name front-loads the “what is it,” so you spend the call on value and fit.
- Stronger budget position. Infrastructure survives budget cuts; “hubs” don’t. You’re selling the last thing they’d drop, not the first.
- Higher perceived worth. “The system you run on” justifies the price the product already earns.
- No price change, no relearning the line. Same nine verticals, same tiers, same rate card — just clearer names.

What to do

- Use the OS names in every deck, email, and conversation from here out. “Hub” is fine as a casual shorthand, never the product name.
- Keep leading with Targeted OS; show your live hub as proof.
- Same prices, same tiers — nothing about the deal changes except the word.

The whole idea in one line

We renamed “Hub” to “OS” because everyone knows what an operating system is — the thing a business runs on — and almost nobody knows what a “hub” is. The name now sells the product before you say a word.

Questions or anything unclear → Anthony. Prices and tiers unchanged; this brief covers the naming only. — Accelerated Experiences, LLC

· AEHub Founder V7.1.